

Historical Novel Society

As a new author, especially if you are self-published, you better be on your toes and ready to do a lot of work.

One of the most important things you can do is get involved in the genre in which you write. I'm sort of a multi-genre writer, but mostly historical fiction. I just joined as a member of the Historical Novel Society. One more forum to hopefully gain exposure.

This is one more tip for the soon-to-be-published writers, who follow me, is to join societies, associations, etc., that involve your genre. I learned that from a writer friend of mine, Jaden Terrell. She writes crime fiction and one of her involvements is in Killer Nashville, a forum for all genres incorporating mystery, thriller, and suspense, where she served as a former Executive Director. But, that's not all she does! Check out her bio on their website:

Isn't that cool? Now, she is branching out to mentor new writers. Check out her website.

So, in learning from Jaden, I have began to join these forums that coincide with my genre, historical fiction. Problem is, I should have done this A LONG TIME AGO! I will always share with you the mistakes I made and this was one of them!

Sign up to follow me on my website if you want to receive more information about my process in becoming a successful author. (Check out Jaden Terrell's website too!)

HAPPY WRITING!
